diamond, but let us feel gratified that we have had the biggest base ball game that was ever held for charity. It has been a splendid thing. A wonderful crowd has been present to watch the efforts of the players and the stunts of those connected with the teams. Those here have enjoyed it all. The music, the game, the hinted mysteries of the Shrine and Grotto shown in their emblems, all have combined to make an enjoyable occasion. Both teams could not win, and I regret that I cannot present this cup to the Shrine as well as to the Grotto, but winning or losing I want you all to feel that your task has been well done."

Gude Accepts Trophy.

Wifliam F. Gude accepted the trophy for the Grotto and ended his brief speech with an assertion that showed he was not worrying about being "buried" next year, "and if nothing happens, I'll be right back here next year to accept the trophy for the

It was the largest crowd that ever has attended a contest between amateur teams here. Conservative estimates placed it at 8,000. Every person in it was enthusiastic, too, and greeted the work of both teams and the music and the "stunts" with applause all during the afternoon. | At others it seemed to falter. Several flies dropped in the outfield which should have been handled, although one was lost in the sun by Milans. The Grotto showed more finish, as was expected, its players being in better condition and more practiced. | Tommy Thompson would have given Hildebrand, who pitched for the Grotto, more of a battle had he received as good support. Except for the widening of the distance between the first two and last crews, there was no change as the four shells swept under the bridge, with only a mile to go to the finish line. Coming out from the bridge, cornell raised its stroke to 32, but Coxswain Jayne called on Syracuse for a higher stroke. The Orange crew responded with 33, and right there Cornell's last chance of victory began to fade.

Syracuse oarsmen appeared to get more power in their drive than did the Courtney pupils and quickly slid into an increasing lead. By this time both Columbia and Pennsylvania were far back in the wash. Half a mile from the finish both crews swerved out of their course, either through fault of the coxswain or from a twist of the creves were inspected to go the finish line, but the Syracuse craft slipped through the water so rapidly that there were two lengths between it and Cornell, the second crew, as they passed the judges' boat.
